(The figures are provisional and do not include information pertaining to certain States)

The Factories Act, 1948 which deals with safety, health and welfare of workers in a factory was thoroughly amended in 1987. The Act now places a general responsibility on the occupier for ensuring safety and health of the workers. It also prescribes the establishment of a comprehensive system of control of physical hazards as well as hazards to health, posed by chemicals. Besides, the Act provides for workers' participation in management of safety. The Factories Act is enforced by the State Governments. The Ministry of Labour have framed Model Rules for the Amendment Act and requested the State Governments for incorporating them in their respective Factory Rules in the interest of uniform application of the statute.

The Directorate General of Factory Advice Service and Labour Institutes under the Labour Ministry conducts a large number of training programmes for the benefit of Inspectors of Factories as well as managers, supervisors and workers. The Ministry has also been implementing an ILO Project on control of Major Accident Hazards as well as a USAID project entitled "Industrial Safety and Health Development Programme" which seek to enhance the capabilities for safety management.
